No intrinsic importance is attached to these empirical formulations, per se. They are merely interesting and convenient, as representing equivalent relations. With regard, however, to certain studies of the molecular volumes of these minerals, in connection with those of the porcelains, these formula; have an essential importance. To forward such studies, with which I lie writer is greatly occupied, much care has been given to density-determinations of all these substances. But this branch of the subject is far from ripe for presentation in this report. 9. Analyses of Chinese and European Porcelains.--No pretence of completeness can be made for the following table; but some of the figures may have been brought together here for the first time; and it is probably sufficient for purposes of comparison with the Japan wares. 10. Microscopic Structure of the Japan Porcelain. Ceramic microscopy bids fair to be a most important adjunct to ceramic chemistry, and no opportunity should be lost of attaining facts in this branch. Learning that Mr. Alexis A. Julien, of the School of Mines of Columbia College, possessed the facilities for this kind of work, I requested him to make a section of the egg-shell porcelain, and contribute to this report a note upon its structure....
