Excerpt: .article briefly, note the date and maker of machines (if visible) and remark on the general condition--how well the machine or other piece of equipment has been maintained and what per cent of the original service value remains, whether it is still an efficient type or so obsolete as to justify early replacement. The work is facilitated greatly if a regular form is provided, with proper columns for the various items mentioned and, in addition, columns for unit prices and totals. Such a sheet is shown in Form XL. It is eight and a half by eleven in size and should have a sufficient margin at the left to allow fitting into a standard binder. When the inventorying is completed and verified, the next step is to price the various articles. This is a task that requires the close attention of an expert. Before finally...
