The distinguishing of color 1. The distinguishing of color is of course an attribute of the sense of sight, and yet in the analysis of sound, particularly of musical tones, there appears a quality so nearly analogous to that of the shades of the spectrum, that-after the general policy of artists as opposed to scientists-musicians have borrowed and readapted a term belonging to another realm rather than to invent one of their own, Color in music is then something which at least the musician will understand, since he has discovered the quality even before there is felt the need of a void with which to describe it. This color may be of two kinds: tone color in the abstract, a timbre - again borrowing from the French - which belongs particularly to single tones or tones of a single pitch; and harmonic color, which is a quality which results from different chord combinations, both as isolated chords and as progressions of chords. The different degrees of tone color are the result of the blending of foundation tone, overtones or harmonics, with false and impure tones, such as must result from the various devices by which tones are produced. Much of the character or individuality of a tone - as of a personality - results from its imperfections rather than from its perfections. If all tones - and all persons - were perfect, they would all be alike; and without variety and without an imaginary...
